Whether this means that phones and tablets will get a new generation of sensors in the future, or that just the current crop of sensors will remain relevant, it is clear that accelerometers are going to get quite a few apps. The good news is that we have a good number of apps that use accelerometers, even if most of them barely get a mention in publications and presentations. Whether the accelerometer is used to find the sound of tap dancing, or to detect when a pet enters the car, there are a number of apps that will come in handy when you are trying to add a new application using this kind of sensor. Not sure whether this is the app you are looking for? We have compiled a list of the best apps that use accelerometers. These are some of the most spectacular apps available on the App Store. AccuNudge - the standardApp for sensor-based applications, AccuNudge replaces the standardMotionXestor App from Apple, and can be found under the Sensors category. Looking for something that will be a bit different to the usual accelerometers apps? Take a look at Dropa...
